But he is good and bad to help people become a bats legend ... On the other hand, I had anxiety. I liked TimBatman 12 when it came out, I was at the perfect age for it, and I also loved Batman Returns. Under Joel Schumacher, the franchise went so bad that I wasn't sure I wanted to revive it. Not least because Batman was one of the few comics I read and loved as a kid, and has always been my favorite superhero. I grew up with comics, watching reruns of the Adam West television series, and then I realized that Burton was seeing celluloid. I was spoiled for choice as a kid, but now as an adult, I'm worried about re-watching the franchise, especially given Warner's track record over the past decade of ruining summer blockbusters with potential everywhere (dare I say The Matrix is turning to sequels? ?) However, I'm happy to report that I couldn't be more wrong when it comes to how Christopher Nolan's The Great Batman begins. It's better than Burton. SALRILEG, you say?! Burton was still cartoonish in many elements and didn't use Schumacher's coat, but Burton's Batman was still over the top. It was perfect as a kid, but Nolan's Batman is real. Everything in this world seems plausible, and therefore it is a world that attracts you. The vulnerability of the characters is much more present. Every bruise, every fear, every worry, every emotion feels real. Part of that is that Nolan has put together an exemplary cast. It bothered me too before I saw the movie. I wasn't sure that a cast with big names from legends like Michael Caine and Morgan Freeman and big names like Liam Neeson and Katie Holmes wouldn't get in the way and distract from Batman. I've always been confident that Christian Bale could be the tall, surly Batman his career has been waiting for, but I wasn't so sure about others. However, Bale isn't just good, he's excellent. I never thought I could imagine anyone other than Michael Keaton as the ultimate Batman for me, but since seeing Batman a few days ago, Bale has settled into the role. Perhaps now Keaton will be able to avoid the ghost of Batman, which really disturbed him for 13 years. The rest of the cast is perfect too. Cillian Murphy is creepy as hell, Liam Neeson is authoritative and imposing, Katie Holmes is strong and sexy. - speak for yourself) and Michael Caine is Alfred, whom you have never seen, but in fact much more like a servant than with aristocratic pompresented. Gary Oldman is also excellent, absolutely decent, because Lieutenant Jim Gordon who happens here much more than Gordon was supposed to do it once. Only Tom Wilkinson has a slightly comically clever American accent that never disappoints. The emotional connection between Bruce Wayne and Alfred is actually an amazing human heart before Nolan and Goyer wrote great. Don't let you think the action isn't front and center. From Wayne's training in the early stages of the film and his early Batman mission in the middle, to the thrilling Chase choreographed sequence and your seat finale. This movie brings a lot of great things (especially Murphy), great story, great performances, great performances ... just a great movie. Possibly the best comic book movie ever made (except for Genius Sin City, which I think is...nice).
